PHYSICAL EDUCATION: PART 1 OF A 2-PART SERIES

Local physicians are frustrated with the number of overweight and obese children. Activity is needed in schools, they say.

Teachers: physical education expands beyond fitness and health

Andrew Webb, 10, ties his shoes before running laps for physical education class at Sherwood Elementary School in Phenix City, Ala. All schools in Alabama are required to offer P.E. courses; Muscogee County just passed a requirement for elementary schools.

Local physician Jan McBarron says it's not every now and then she has an obese child come to her practice. "It's every day."

Columbus pediatrician Susan McWhirter often sees children with hypertension and Type 2 diabetes, something practically "unknown" to her practice when she began.

And Brindlea Griffin, director of nutrition for Phenix City Schools, says all she has to do is walk down a school hallway to see "there is a big problem with our children."

That's why all three encourage parents and schools to provide better diets and more physical activity for children and why all three say they are glad to hear the Muscogee County School District plans to bring back physical education classes to elementary schools.

According to an Institute of Medicine report on the PTA Web site, almost one-third of children ages 6-19 are considered overweight and 9 million children over the age of 6 are obese. According to the U.S. Department of Health and Family Services, the problem of overweight children has tripled in the past two decades, and overweight adolescents have a 70 percent chance of becoming overweight or obese adults.

Students pick up academic skills via physical education

Today students at Dexter Elementary may be learning about even and odd numbers through a game of tag.

Or they may be practicing their spelling words as part of an obstacle course.

"We focus on academics through physical education," said Pam Koon, the physical education teacher at the Fort Benning school. "Kids learn by doing. We adapt games to fit the lessons."

Besides encouraging students to live healthy lifestyles, teachers and administrators at Fort Benning, Muscogee County and Phenix City schools say regular physical fitness classes teach students valuable skills and help them perform better

Party on: St. Pat wasn't Irish, either

Here's a bit of a shocker for you: St. Patrick wasn't Irish. That's right. The saint for whom Ireland's most treasured holiday is named was from Great Britain.

It kind of puts a new spin on the word shamrock, doesn't it?

In fact, he was born in the part of Great Britain that was under Roman control at the time (the late 4th century). So if he was puzzled by his nationality, well, it's understandable. Maybe that's why, on St. Patrick's Day, everyone's allowed to claim to be Irish.

Ponder that while you're looking for suitable ways to celebrate the day. There's a 10 a.m. parade at St. Patrick's Catholic Church at 1502 Broad St. in Phenix City, and there are parties here and there tonight — at the Shanty Shack, SoHo Bar & Grill and the 1000 block bars on Broadway.

But what would real Irish folks be doing today?

Breda Gleeson should know. The owner of Scruffy Murphy's is Irish the other 364 days of the year, too. She remembers wearing a shamrock and dressing in green as a youngster
